Microsoft is clearly guilty of a wide range of anti-competetive practices. Allowing them free access to a new untapped market (low-income schools) and to return to business as usual doesn't seem very much like justice to me. To have them donate (as the Red Hat Linux executives suggest) computer hardware (which they don't make, so it actually costs them money) to the schools seems like a more reasonable punishment. What are we going to do to guide their behavior in the future?
